Cleveland BioLabs Inc. has received a drug development grant worth between $1.3 million and $2.4 million from the Defense Threat Reduction Agency of the Department of Defense.

In collaboration with the Armed Forces Radiobiology Research Institute, the grant will help Cleveland BioLabs develop its drug that protects people from the effects of radiation poisoning. The Defense Department intends to buy the drug to protect military personnel from radiological attack or terrorism.

Cleveland BioLabs announced in December that it would move much of its operations to Buffalo, N.Y., with its founder later this year.
